6. apply theories and principles to “real-life” situations.
7. foster teamwork and collaboration both within and between groups and through the development of projects that bring students together more effectively by taking several different perspectives into account.
8. promote learning outside the formal classroom through independent learning, internships, extended and supervised research, and other activities.
9. provide opportunities for publication or presentation of student work where it may be reviewed and evaluated.
10. where appropriate, require students to present their work on a matter through established national or international forums.

It is specifically recognized that honors courses may include other courses that support an upper-division honors program in addition to those outlined above. In such cases, the guidelines above should be regarded as general guidelines.
